PATERSON

THE City of Paterson, located on the Passaic River, seventeen miles northwest of the great metropolis of New York, is one of the mighty industrial cities of the United States. Here in 1840 the beginnings of the great silk industry were established by John Ryle, a young Englishman. It has grown to be a gigantic business now employing over 25,000 wage-earners, working in about one hundred and forty mills fitted with the finest machinery for the production of all grades of silk.

The larger part of the " Lyons of America " is situated on a plain surrounded on two sides by high hills, although in some places the city has expanded to the higher ground, especially where the Passaic River passes through the hills and descends over the beautiful Passaic Falls. In addition to the silk industry, Paterson is the center of important steel and iron manufacturing, including the building of locomotives, and ranks fourth in the value of the annual product of its breweries.

The city has many public buildings of superlative beauty, twenty-one public schools maintained at the highest standard, and nearly one hundred well-supported or well-endowed religious institutions. The streets of Paterson are famous throughout New Jersey, and its splendid parks and cemeteries are a credit to the public spirit of its citizens.

Although the city has suffered severely from fire and flood during its corporate existence since 1840, the inherent and indomitable energy of her people has overcome every disadvantage and disaster, until she now stands today firmly established as one of the most progressive communities of the prosperous commonwealth of New Jersey, proudly boasting a population nearly reaching the one hundred and fifty thousand mark.
